It has been said that there are no major differences between the U.S. and Australia, only thousands of minor ones. Is this really so, or are there in fact some very important differences that help us understand the often very distinct experiences of both places? If so, what are the origins of these differences?

While this course is primarily concerned with the performance and development of the Australian economy over the past 200 years, we will examine how this experience is embedded in broader social realities. We thus explore Australia's history, politics, and culture – through both lectures and guest speakers we try to understand the similarities and the differences between U.S. and Australian attitudes and behaviors and how these have affected economic outcomes.

By the end of the course we want you to do more than describe the macroeconomic performance of Australia. We hope that you can also explain how it reflects the broader attitudes and social norms that have been shaped by Australia's unique history and geography. Further, we hope that this discussion encourages you to reflect on the nature and origin of American attitudes and norms, and instills in you the ability to discern differences across groups in terms of their beliefs and behaviors

Comprehensive Fee Includes: Transportation and course arrangements as indicated, hotel accommodations in twin and triple rooms, continental breakfast daily and three group dinners. (subject to change)

Prerequisites: Introduction to macroeconomics and introduction to microeconomics. A single course in introductory economics may suffice if it covers both areas
