New Zealand offers a magnificent opportunity to study the difficulty of implementing a national policy of sustainable development. We explore sites that both showcase New Zealand's natural history and its ongoing efforts to maintain endangered ecosystems while also trying to achieve a very high standard of living for its people. We visit with experts on a whole variety of policy issues, including the development of alternative sources of energy, the management of a comprehensive resource planning system, the integration of indigenous cultures into sustainable development efforts, and national efforts to preserve threatened and endangered species.

We spend an equal amount of time on both the North and the South Island, visiting New Zealand's major cities of Auckland, Wellington, Dunedin, Christchurch, Auckland, Wellington, Queenstown and Dunedin. We also spend time at some of the country's most renowned natural treasures, including the Franz Josef glacier, Fiordland, and the magnificent beaches of the Tasman sea and Stewart Island.

The course also takes us to the heartland of New Zealand's first settlers, the Maori of Polynesian migrants that came to New Zealand from the islands of the south Pacific. We examine carefully the on-going efforts to maintain the Maori culture while assuring that they are not left behind New Zealand's push towards a globally-based economy.

The course introduces you to New Zealand's unique flora and fauna through a combination of guided wilderness hikes, museum visits, and just plain observation. We have the opportunity to see groundbreaking projects designed to restore the many varieties of ground-dwelling birds indigenous to the islands. Our visits include a full-day excursion to an island habitat project as well as visits to bush (or forest) preserves throughout the country.

Comprehensive Fee Includes: Transportation and course arrangements as indicated, hotel accommodations in twin and triple rooms, continental breakfast daily, five lunches and six dinners; one night host family (Te Awamutu). (subject to change)

Prerequisites: The course does not have any academic prerequisites.

Required Readings: A packet of readings provided by the faculty director.
